

- For my kids, setting a timer instead of making them finish is more productive. They still get a sense of accomplishment of completing their task, but if they are really struggling they get more time on it by picking up where they left off the next school day. If they aren't struggling with a lesson or subject then they might get multiple lessons at a time. Take time to double check they are actually understanding and retaining the information, and not just rushing through and completing the page.
- Your goal isn't to graduate them by 12 and into medical school by 15, but to give them the best well-rounded education for them.
- Not everyone is going to college and that's ok. God gave them special gifts to be used for His glory, not to make us look good.
- Utilize online and DVD curriculum, many out there have self grade options too (faith based options as well). It is okay to not be hands on for every subject and every child.

- Set your child daily outline of subjects, estimates of time spent, and allow them to be accountable instead of hand holding them.
- Many children will thrive with this independence and their own work.
- You can be a “learning facilitator” and teach your child how to find the answers, how to research, how to apply themselves, how to learn, while LOVING the learning process.
- Figure out the learning area your child needs, and do that. If they need no stimulation take away as many visual stimulants as you can.
- Help for ADD or ADHD kids